M. Ballantyne,2017-06-22 The Wild Karroo A solitary horseman a youth in early manhood riding at a snail s pace over the great plains or karroo of South Africa His chin on his breast his hands in the pockets of an old shooting coat his legs in ragged trousers and his feet in worn out boots Regardless of stirrups the last are dangling The reins hang on the neck of his steed whose head may be said to dangle from its shoulders so nearly does its nose approach the ground A felt hat covers the youth s curly black head and a double barrelled gun is slung across his broad shoulders We present this picture to the reader as a subject of contemplation It was in the first quarter of the present century that the youth referred to Charlie Considine by name rode thus meditatively over that South African karroo His depression was evidently not due to lack of spirit for when he suddenly awoke from his reverie drew himself up and shook back his hair his dark eyes opened with something like a flash They lost some of their fire however as he gazed round on the hot plain which undulated like the great ocean to the horizon where a line of blue indicated mountains The truth is that Charlie Considine was lost utterly lost on the karroo That his horse was in the same lost condition became apparent from its stopping without orders and looking round languidly with a sigh Come Rob Roy said the youth gathering up the reins and patting the steed s neck this will never do You and I must not give in to our first misfortune No doubt the want of water for two days is hard to bear but we are strong and young both of us Come let s try at least for a sheltering bush to sleep under before the sun goes down Animated by the cheering voice if not by the words of its rider the horse responded to the exhortation by breaking into a shuffling canter After a short time the youth came in sight of what appeared to be a herd of cattle in the far distance In eager expectation he galloped towards them and found that his conjectures were correct They were cattle in charge of one of that lowest of the human race a Bushman The diminutive black skinned and monkey faced creature was nearly naked He carried a sheepskin kaross or blanket on his left shoulder and a knobbed stick or kerrie in his right hand Can you speak English asked Considine as he rode up The Bushman looked vacant and made no reply Where is your master s house asked the youth A stare was the only answer Can t you speak you dried up essence of stupidity exclaimed Charlie with impatience At this the Bushman uttered something with so many clicks klucks and gurgles in it that his interrogator at once relinquished the use of the tongue and took to signs but with no better success his efforts having only the effect of causing the mouth of the Bushman to expand from ear to ear Uttering a few more clicks and gurgles he pointed in the direction of the setting sun
