The Gate of Appreciation Carleton Eldredge Noyes, 2016-04-07

Art is creation. It is the combination of already existing material elements into new forms, which become thus the realization of a preconceived idea. Both hut and picture rose in the imagination of their makers before they took shape as things. The material of each was given already in nature, but the form as the maker fashioned it was new. Commonly we think of art as the expression and communication of emotion. A picture, a statue, a symphony we recognize as the symbol of what the artist has felt in some passage of his experience and the means by which he conveys his feeling to us. Art is the expression of emotion, but all art springs out of need. The sense of need which impels expression through the medium.

Excerpt from The Gate of Appreciation: Studies in the Relation of Art to Life. In the daily life of the ordinary man, a life crowded with diverse interests and increasingly complex demands, some few moments of a busy week or month or year are accorded to an interest in art. Whatever may be his vocation, the man feels instinctively that in his total scheme of life, books, pictures, music, have somewhere a place. In his own business or profession, he is an expert, a man of special training; and intelligently he does not aspire to a complete understanding of a subject which lies beyond his province. In the same spirit, in which he is a master of his own craft, he is content to leave expert knowledge of art to the expert, to the artist, and to the connoisseur. For his part, as a layman, he remains frankly and happily on the outside. But he feels none the less that art has an interest and a meaning even for him.
